

Four Students Honored As Loeb Fellows

Four dedicated students at the Nackey S. Loeb School of Communications were named Loeb Fellows at the school's 2007 First Amendment Awards dinner.

The students completed a total of five classes, workshops and special programs and submitted personal statements and an essay on the First Amendment.

The four new Nackey Loeb Fellows are:

Floranne Hammond of Bedford, who has seen her work published in local newspapers since taking Loeb School classes. "I don't think I could have gotten out of the starting gate without words of wisdom and experience from the instructors."

Ashlee Lange of Manchester, who describes herself as a diehard journalism student. "Being able to freely express ideas aloud without fear of being punished is key as to why free speech and press are so meaningful, not only to myself, but to every American citizen."

Amelia Marden, of Hooksett, who began high school as an uncertain member of her newspaper staff and now is editor-in-chief in her senior year. "The Nackey Loeb School of Communications has served as a vital catalyst to make what I've accomplished possible. The school has provided me with the education and experience necessary to excel in journalism."

Kathy Radford of Kingston, who has enhanced her passion for photography and writing with Loeb classes. "I, for one, am not willing to give up my rights that our forefathers fought so hard to guarantee Stand up for your rights now. Don't let all their hard work be in vain."
