SCHOOL OF COMMUNICATIONS

Nackey S. Loeb School offers autumn classes

MANCHESTER - Add some color to your writing and photography this fall with free classes at the Nackey S. Loeb School of Communications.

Photography, Multi-media and Feature Writing will be offered in a six-week session of Wednesday evening classes beginning Sept. 9.

Taught by veteran photographer Geoff Forester, Photography helps students identify and use the elements of good news and feature photography. Through hands-on activities and practical assignments, students learn the skills of telling a story through photographs and produce a photo essay. Students will need a digital SLR or 35 mm SLR camera. The class is offered from 6:30-8 p.m.

In Multi-media, Nashua Telegraph Photo Editor Don Himsel teaches how to combine photos and sound to develop multi-media packages that offer news organizations a new and more colorful way of reporting. Tools and technology for producing multi-media packages for the web may change, but the good habits taught in the class will remain at the foundation of these new methods. Students will need a digital camera, a cable or memory card to upload photos to a computer, a digital recorder and cable to upload sound. The class is offered from 5-6:30 p.m.

Feature Writing will help those who want to tell more colorful stories with words. Taught by Steve Billingham, a former editor at the Eagle-Tribune and adjunct journalism professor at Chester College, this course delves into using detail and good quotes to bring stories alive. The objective is to develop a foundation in journalistic feature writing and learn how to craft a feature article. The course will examine the structural and emotional components of feature stories, as well as feature writing as "creative nonfiction." The class is offered from 6:30-8 p.m.

All classes are free of charge to students of all ages.

Applications are available at www.loebschool.org or by calling 627-0005.
